

At the "Hackers' Conference" (pg. 44), participants helped with dishwashing to keep the costs down. The first volunteer was Steve Wozniak (right), designer of the Apple computer, who's worth $70-$100 million these days. Next to him in blue, Andy Hertzfeld, one of the designers of the Conference (as well as the Macintosh computer), worth fewer millions. Among their hacker peers their design ingenuity and generosity counted far more than wealth or fame.